Response adaptive designs use the available information of treatment effect to modify treatment allocation probabilities to assign more patients to the potential treatment. The modification treatment allocation probabilities create a dependency in the data collected from a response adaptive clinical trial. This study explores the statistical inference for the designs when sample sizes are small. Exact distribution of allocation proportion will be presented and exact statistical power function will be compared for different designs.