We propose a randomized minima-maxima nomination sampling design for the use in finite populations which generalizes maxima nomination sampling. The design is simple to implement and results in easy to calculate inclusion probabilities for population elements, estimators and variance formulae. We show, through numerical studies, that the proposed design can result in significant improvements in efficiency compared to simple random sampling without replacement designs for a wide choice of population types.