

---

ROBERT B GRAMACY, University of Chicago

Optimization under Unknown Constraints

We consider optimization for computer experiments under unknown constraints, i.e., when simulation is required to determine real-valued responses and check constraints. We develop GP surrogates to approximate both simulator outputs. A new integrated improvement criterion recognizes that responses that violate the constraint are still informative about the function, and thus potentially useful in the optimization. We illustrate our approach on a problem from health care policy.